ABOUT THIS PROGRAM

Necrotizing enterocolitis (NEC) is a life-threatening illness among newborns, with a mortality rate as high as 50%, and most cases occurring in premature infants. There is also a wide variation in the rates and outcomes of NEC by race and ethnicity. Nurses are typically the first to detect signs of NEC development, yet they have few “tools in their tool belt” to improve NEC risk awareness. This program will review the pathophysiology and clinical signs of NEC, social determinants of health as related to NEC, and evidence-based practice prevention strategies and management.

OUR SPEAKER

Dr. Sachin Amin is the Medical Director of the NICU at Loyola University Medical Center, an Associate Professor of Pediatrics at Loyola's Stritch School of Medicine, and the Medical Co-Director of the Administrative Perinatal Center. He serves on multiple hospital and NICU committees, including NICU quality initiatives.
